Working together, arts community achieves more

The Portland Arts Alliance meets at various venues, including this meeting last October at Portland City Hall.

When arts organizations collaborate to tackle tough issues, the entire community benefits. Here are just some of the partnerships taking place in our region.

Despite the many challenges of this past recession – or perhaps because of them – arts organizations throughout the region have been collaborating more than ever before. Artistic leaders are promoting each other's programs in curtain speeches and online. In March we saw the arts community band together and rally for the same cause – arts funding – by turning out in force for RACC's annual State of the Arts presentation to Portland City Council. And within the past year, 12 arts organizations in Washington County have joined forces to promote their events and services in collaboration with community newspapers, libraries, chambers of commerce, wineries, and visitor's associations in Beaverton, Hillsboro, Aloha, Forest Grove, Banks, Bethany, Gaston, Tigard, Tualatin, and Sherwood.

Some of the most fertile ground for collaboration is taking place within a recently-formed group, the Portland Arts Alliance. The alliance, which was first formed in the spring of 2008, began with Oregon Ballet Theater, Portland Center Stage, Oregon Symphony, Portland Opera, Portland Art Museum and White Bird. Their goal was to explore common programming threads, such as the successful Month of Mozart project several years ago.

Having quickly realized the power of pulling groups like these together, Paul King and Walter Jaffe, co-founders of White Bird, decided to expand the group with a lunch meeting at their home office in the summer of 2008. They extended the invitation to additional organizations as well as cultural attractions such as the Oregon Zoo and OMSI, and even Mayor-Elect Sam Adams joined in the meeting that attracted representatives from 35 organizations.

Today, the Portland Arts Alliance is a strong coalition of more than 60 individuals representing approximately 40 organizations – and even more groups are welcome to join in. The guiding principle of the group, which now meets every two months hosted by different organizations in different locations, is to unite Portland's arts and culture groups, large and small, in working together to build audience and patrons in order to increase earned and contributed income. The alliance has met at Portland Center Stage, Oregon Zoo, OMSI, BodyVox Dance Studio (co-hosted with Oregon Ballet Theatre), Portland Center for the Performing Arts (co-hosted with Travel Portland), the Interstate Firehouse Cultural Center (IFCC) and even Portland City Hall. Representatives from The Regional Arts & Culture Council, the Oregon Cultural Trust, the Oregon Arts Commission, the Creative Advocacy Network and Portland City Hall also attend these meetings.

The alliance continues to concentrate on ways that organizations can collaborate to achieve greater results, and several committees have been established to focus on specific collaborations. A marketing group, for instance, focuses on collaborative marketing ideas such as promoting each other's programs through HulaHub's "Director's Picks" feature. A Green Gift Guide group is responsible for promoting the idea of giving tickets to performances during the holidays with special discount offers. A Green Team is working with the Business Center of Portland to develop green practices in the performing arts. Other committees in the early stages are exploring internet radio, Oregon's Day of Culture, street fairs, and contributed income.

The next meeting of the Portland Arts Alliance is May 25. Contact
pkling@whitebird.org for more information.

Each of the Alliance's 90-minute lunch meetings are open to all Portland-area arts and culture groups, and normally one or two individuals from each group will attend. Art galleries and visual arts organizations are also welcome, and there is no formal invitation. King and Jaffe continue to coordinate these meetings, sending out announcements about a month in advance to a growing email list. The only requirement is that organizations RSVP in advance of the meeting, and all attendees are asked to contribute $10 to offset the cost of lunch.

RACC salutes the efforts of the Portland Arts Alliance and other collaborations throughout the regional arts community. For more information about the Portland Arts Alliance, please contact Paul King at White Bird, pkling@whitebird.org.

LETTER FROM THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR: OFF TO WASHINGTON

We are delighted that The Right Brain Initiative, our vital new model for regional arts education, has been selected with the Gresham-Barlow School District as one of 14 new nationwide Partners in Education by The Kennedy Center in Washington D.C. Our delegation will be provided with the latest tools to support the Right Brain's growing professional development offerings and learn best practices from 90 partners around the country. We are currently the only Oregon team in this program.

Right Brain's professional development component sets it apart from other area artists-in-schools programs. Through hands-on training teachers, artists and principals bring arts learning to students and integrate the arts across the core curriculum. It facilitates collaboration between teachers and artists to ensure meaningful experiences in theater, music, dance, literature and visual arts that meet curricular goals in literacy. Teachers are thrilled to have new teaching skills to continue using after the artists have left the building and artists hone their talents to make learning stimulating and unforgettable to kids.

As we build The Right Brain Initiative, add new schools to the program, involve new artists and arts organizations, and strive to constantly improve program delivery and effectiveness we always keep our eyes on our ultimate goal – to achieve a measurable impact on learning by integrating the community's arts and cultural resources into the education of every k-8 student in every classroom in our tri-county region. We rely on our Implementation Partner, Young Audiences, our Professional Development and Assessment partners, and all our community collaborators – school districts, public and private funders, artists, arts organizations, individuals who volunteer time and resources. Thanks!
