Arts education helps English Language Learners succeed

A 1st grader at Quatama Elementary in Hillsboro explores the sounds that a ukulele makes with The Right Brain Initiative and partner organization My Voice Music.

At Quatama Elementary School in Hillsboro, students speak 26 different languages. While this diversity is an undeniable strength, it can also make teaching and learning a challenge. According to Janis Hill, who was Quatama's principal for six years: "It's hard to sit still in school all day, especially when you don't understand the language."

Quatama has been a partner of The Right Brain Initiative, the arts integration program of the Regional Arts & Culture Council, since 2009. The program brings teaching artists into classrooms, and provides training for school staff. Both Quatama and Right Brain staff know that when the arts are meaningfully integrated with the curriculum, they are a powerful way to reach more learners. "The arts involve different parts of the brain or body. They can be connected to culture and identity. They get kids excited,” says Hill. “The arts are crucial to our equity work.”

Consider this example: In the spring of 2014, Kindergartners at Quatama worked with Right Brain partner organization My Voice Music (MVM), to integrate music and literacy. One class was comprised of 50% English Language Learners, and a pre-residency test showed that one-half of the students recognized three or fewer letters. During four sessions, MVM’s energetic teaching artist, Santigie Fofana-Dura, introduced the kids to musical instruments at the same time he taught letters of the alphabet. They used instruments and their bodies to make noise—slapping, strumming, beat boxing—connecting the sounds of letters to sounds in the environment.

After these sessions, 80% of students doubled their letter recognition, and their teacher Carly Klimke remarked: “I could see quite a difference in what they were using to recall the name and sound of each letter. Several gave me the name of the letter in a beat. Instead of just, ‘b,’ they would rap, ‘b, ba, ba, ba, beeee....”

“The level of engagement was incredible,” said Hill. “One Somalian student, I had never seen her so animated.”

Spectacular new data further validates the effectiveness of this work across the Portland metro region, correlating Right Brain with a significant increase in standardized English Language Proficiency Assessment (ELPA) scores. National arts consultancy WolfBrown, with support from Portland State University, looked at test scores for all 18,711 unique students who attended Right Brain schools between the 2007-08 and 2012-2013 school years. Immediately before schools started working with Right Brain, the average annual increase in English proficiency scores was 1.3 points (see graph). Once schools partnered with the Initiative, scores immediately spiked, increasing by 10.1 points—nearly 10 times more than the prior year. And scores continued to rise as schools engaged more deeply with the program. On average, students attending the most immersed schools scored 20.6 points higher on ELPA exams than they did before their schools joined Right Brain.

For all students, reading and math scores also increased once they began working with the Initiative, and they continued to rise as schools engaged more deeply with the program.

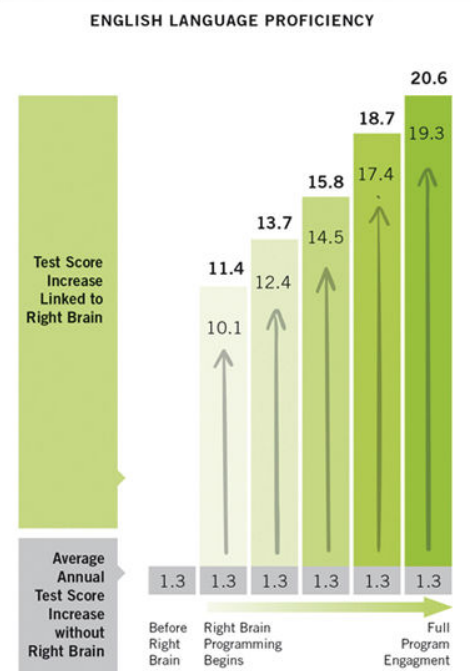

It’s clear from both anecdotes and data, students are learning with integrated arts education. Right Brain provides a critical gateway to knowledge and curiosity. Movement, theatre, poetry, and printmaking help more students synthesize information, solve problems, and take ownership of their learning.

This research shows us that not only is it important to provide all children with access to the arts, but also that arts learning plays a key role in the quest for a more equitable education system.

Right Brain will serve an estimated 20,000 students this school year at 59 schools in seven school districts. At full scale, the Initiative will serve all K-8 students in Clackamas, Multnomah and Washington Counties. Learn about this new data, and more, by downloading the 2014 Progress Report at bit.ly/RightBrain_ProgressReport2014, or by visiting TheRightBrainInitiative.org.
